Two Poems by Ellen McGrath Smith

January

It's easy to make the connection: the moths in the kitchen last week, dead of winter, meant the oatmeal was seeded with eggs and their gooey unravelling.

At 50,

I'm no longer amazed when predictions I make are as real as the ashy gray wings twitching inside the plastic bag, biosphere beyond a moth's wildest dreams.

Younger,

the infestation would have been loss drilling through my middle, the trigger bearing down and carving out the wider rings, from a snub at a party or summer cold to complete annihilation.

It's good now, not to feel that early drilling as fear hollowing out my whole being, from my first embryonic pulsing at the center, larval in its faceless outward push, to the assemblage of bone and scar and soul

I am today.

One day

when I'm more empty than full, the lines between cause and effect will appear as thick rope in the foreground, an endless net releasing the red scarves, loose tongues, and ruined grains into living air.

Teaching Notes

Graphically depicting anyone's intestines is the end of romance and the beginning of a stunned innocence that wriggles through the dirt so it can breathe -or so my student wrote in completely abstract, general terms, which I told him in my comments. What he said was "everything falls back to nature," and he's not wrong if one really looks at things and doesn't conjure packaged faith. I wrote, "Say a little more about what does this look like?"

(The intestines and worms are mine.)
