

I Dream of a Two-Headed Snake [1]

May 6, 2019 Featured Poetry [2]

Disabled Poets Take on... [3]

Poem by Robin Chapman

I Dream of a Two-Headed Snake

Wake to ask, what image has surfaced this python from what archetypal ark?

Each head the head of a Siberian polar bear striking first left, then right—then everywhere

I Dream of a Two-Headed Snake

Published on Talking Writing (<https://www.talkingwriting.com>)

on the dry-baked grid, fanged heads poke up from their chessboard holes, our task to chase each back to its lair though nowhere is there a sign of ice and we race, a tribe of girls, to save ourselves and our world, though when I look up two-headed snake in the dictionary I find Amphisbaena alba, a white worm lizard resistant to bites whose camouflaged tail improves the odds of its survival by fifty percent and then I find one in Aeschylus's Agamemnon musing on what odious monster I shall call her speaking of Clytemnestra, a woman who has slain a man—poison from both mouths—and another Greek tale of the two-headed snakes spawned from the blood that dripped from Medusa's head of hair as Perseus flew with it over the Libyan desert, snakes feeding on the corpses left by Cato's army—or the Aztec's image of a double-headed serpent made of turquoise, maybe a gift from Moctezuma to Cortés, symbol of rebirth, earth and underworld housed in the British Museum, and it's true, in my dream, the scene suddenly switched to a group of women telling Kundalini stories, that energy that snakes up the spine.

Meanwhile, all those polar bears sank in the sands of the Libyan desert, drowning in all that heat—and now I dream I'm trying to find my husband to tell him to come see the plays that young girls have rewritten after Aeschylus—this time the babies will not be dashed against the wall.

Art Information

- “Two-Headed Snake [4]” © Hans Hillewaert; Creative Commons license.

I Dream of a Two-Headed Snake

Published on Talking Writing (<https://www.talkingwriting.com>)

Robin Chapman's tenth book, The Only Home We Know, was published this spring from Tebot Bach. She is the recipient of Appalachia's 2010 Poetry Prize, the Cider Press Review Editor's Prize Book Award, two Wisconsin Library Association awards, and the Posner Poetry Award for previous collections. Most recently, Six True Things, poems of growing up in the Atomic City of Oak Ridge, Tennessee, received the Wisconsin Library Association's Outstanding Achievement in Poetry Award. Her poems have appeared in Alaska Quarterly Review, Ascent, and Valparaiso Poetry Review.

Source URL: <https://www.talkingwriting.com/i-dream-two-headed-snake>

Links:

- [1] <https://www.talkingwriting.com/i-dream-two-headed-snake>
- [2] <https://www.talkingwriting.com/talkingwriting-categories/featured-poetry>
- [3] <https://www.talkingwriting.com/tw-channels-and-categories/disabled-poets-take>
- [4] <https://www.flickr.com/photos/bathyporeia/9083772793/>