Poem by Jacqueline Schaalje

Dust to Dusting

Holy water for brook, brown habit for tree, stained glass for a notepad—Mr. X, Catholic by upbringing, inhabits a Latin landscape, imparting wonder like the vernacular hassock that is my atlas. Wasting days until Dad, accusing me of putting down roots, chased me away. I pored over the forests and plains where I knew not a soul—what kind of person, what sign, brought forth a snow-capped steeple. I mean, what is nurture?
Meanwhile, 'round the table where a stern brother broke bread and gave a stir in the leek soup, where crows cawed over the wooden Saint Peter, Mr. X was packed for boarding school.

There, prim brothers taught him, besides a firm grasp of poetics, sin and sense. And dust, heaps of dust, he told his orthodox neighbor, who contracted a frown, his conversion overtures thwarted. "Do you want," he said, "to saddle your wife with all that dusting, vacuuming those mud rivers and clearing up soot banks, when we all clutter God's heavenly landscape?"
